

Ethical, efficient and excellent. These are merely a few of the words by which I can describe Attorney Jennifer.

On the practical side of things, Jennifer promptly returns phone calls, e-mails, etc. No waiting for days for a return call. The firm's comfortable offices are conveniently located with adequate free parking just a few steps from the office. No need to battle downtown traffic or pay exorbitant parking fees. Her billing practices are reasonable and more than fair for the high level of legal expertise she provides.

I retained Jennifer after one of her clients suggested that I contact her for help in a never-ending divorce matter. She was described to me as a "no nonsense scorpion." That was exactly what I needed.

I previously had been represented by (and fired) four high-priced "boutique" attorneys who substituted their judgment for mine without informing me of the actions they undertook, such as stipulating to allegations which were nothing but fantasy conjured up by the plaintiff (my ex), to enhance her chances of being awarded alimony, for who knows how long, and in what amount. Through this divorce matter I became convinced that divorce is all about the $$$'s and not much else. It is a procedure similar to that of a parasite bleeding the victim host.

Jennifer kept me fully informed of every action she intended to take. She sought my input and told me what options were available to me. She didn't "sugarcoat" anything and told me what could be expected, good or otherwise.

Jennifer successfully battled the plaintiff's motions and we eventually demanded that the plaintiff appear for deposition. During the deposition, I saw that plaintiff's attorney (whom I refer to as an advocate) was no match for Jennifer.

Plaintiff's theatrics went so far as to engage the services of an armed "investigator" to accompany her and her advocate to the deposition. I was contemplating demanding that he be removed from the room since I didn't invite him, but allowed him to remain as an additional witness as to what was to follow.

I lost track of how many times Jennifer posed relevant questions to the plaintiff and the advocate told the plaintiff not to answer. Jennifer eventually offered to provide the advocate with a copy of the rules governing depositions of this type and informed the advocate that the plaintiff must answer. The advocate seemed to be upset by Jennifer's offer of help as he claimed to know the rules.

Early on in the divorce proceedings the plaintiff obtained an order precluding me from disposing of any of the marital assets. This order was found to apply to both the plaintiff and me. We found that the plaintiff violated the court order that she herself requested and disposed of a jointly owned vehicle.

A certified copy of the title transfer from the State of Florida was obtained and it contained a forgery purporting to be my signature. Jennifer entered the forged document into evidence and presented it to the advocate and the plaintiff. The plaintiff appeared to me to be shocked when she viewed the forgery and agreed that it was a forgery of my signature. The plaintiff was left to explain as she was the only one who benefitted from the forgery. Shortly thereafter the deposition concluded with the plaintiff exclaiming that she needed a "break."

Jennifer and I agreed that we would conclude this portion of the inquiry. I fully expected that the plaintiff would be ordered to appear later to answer the relevant questions she refused to answer.

Shortly thereafter Jennifer contacted me and advised that a settlement offer was being made by the plaintiff and her advocate. After review I suggested some changes to the plaintiff's offer. I wanted a no contact provision, a provision prohibiting the plaintiff from making any disparaging comments about me during the course of the marriage and a provision making the settlement non-modifiable.

Plaintiff's demands for alimony disappeared. Jennifer advised me that after a 28-year marriage it was unheard of for alimony not to be demanded nor ordered.

I am fortunate to have retained Jennifer and am fortunate that the plaintiff retained the advocate she chose.

Thank you, Jennifer!
